I love D&D 5e, and after reading another post on here, I decided to try a game. I picked the fighter as my class, and so far I'm enjoying it immensely. However, I'm curious: why are there no other classes, besides Fighter, that rely on (mostly) casting? In the books and in the 4e D&D, they simply said that there were no spells. I'm beginning to understand that in 5e, there is less emphasis on spells. But, it still seems like there are classes that focus on casting (and thus, avoiding combat) and other classes that are only good at fighting. Can anyone explain why? A: There are plenty of spellcasters. The Fighter is not the only choice. There are lots of different classes. Fighters are just one of them. There are lots of different skills. D&D is about many different things. D&D 4e was heavily focused on combat. That is one focus, and it is a common one. A: There is no one right answer. Every class has some spells. The 'right' answer depends on the game, the campaign and the setting. What I'm going to say is only valid in the context of the 5e game. Combat is a big deal in D&D, and Fighters are good at it. 2d92ce491b
