The problem is, I want to apply the system globally (all users are in different countries). I found out that PayPal will not let you do that. If you try to transfer money from one country to another, PayPal will redirect the user to a PayPal.com page where the user can choose the country he/she wants to use. I'm a bit lost at this point. I would like to have the user just type his/her bank details (eg. IBAN) and then paypal will transfer the money. All transactions need to be verified. Do you have any suggestions? A: PayPal has a broad range of partners that allows you to perform one of the following: You can use your own implementation that supports all currencies, including different tax-jurisdiction. You can use a provider for certain countries. For example, in Spain, you can use UNAUDIA or Bancaja. You can use a provider that supports specific currencies, for example, if you are dealing with a US-based customer, you can provide services that work well with a US-based bank. You can offer a bank-based payment service like you would offer credit cards. The last option, though, requires that you handle all the bank details related to the customer/sender, so you'll have to look into these. PayPal does not support anything that will allow you to provide a service that connects countries together, and for good reason: it's a murky and complicated affair and they can't be responsible for what happens if the user mistypes a bank name or the country he/she lives in. This is why you're redirected to the country's PayPal site, which is where you should be if you want to be responsible for the transfer. Most of the time, users will understand that the local PayPal site is the one to deal with if they use that to transfer money, and they will have no trouble using it. What I'd recommend for you is to have a similar site for each country, but make sure the site is clear about where the responsibility lies, and that the user cannot misunderstand it.
