Mumbai Localities – Geographical and Historical Background The Geographical Organization of Mumbai is shown in Figure 2. This map highlights the basic divisions of Mumbai, such as suburbs, areas within the city, islands, districts, and regions. Figure 2 also indicates the various minor divisions, such as schools and markets. Many government offices and state agencies are situated on the various islands in the city. The lowlands on the western side of Mumbai are in the region of Mahim and that region is commonly called Bombay (now Mumbai). The west coast of India is also in this region. The mainland of Mumbai is in the central region. One of the most important tributaries of the River Peth is located in this area and is named the Wadala River. The island of Dadar in the south of Mumbai is associated with the station known as the Mumbai Central railway station. Many airports are located near this area, including Mumbai's international airport. The eastern and southeastern parts of Mumbai are also on the mainland. The western area of the city is divided by the Arabian Sea into the harbor, the Bunder region, and the W. The Bunder region is bounded to the north by the Marine Drive, to the east by the Jogeshwari suburb, and to the west by the Lokhandwala suburb. The Bunder region extends from the eastern edge of Dadar to the western edge of Mahim. The different areas within the city are indicated in Figure 3. As one can see from Figure 3, the suburbs have expanded from the central area of Mumbai to the east, west, and north. There are also several beautiful residential areas and major tourist attractions around Mumbai, such as the suburb of Bandra in the east, the district of Bandstand in the west, and the western part of Colaba in the north. The suburbs of Mumbai were developed in the mid-20th century for residential purposes. There are many markets in the suburbs of Mumbai. The industry and commercial centers of Mumbai are located along the coastline, which extends from the western part of Mumbai to the southern portion of Mumbai.
