This is the first software I downloaded on Windows 7 x64. I was interested to know why I had to pay for registration of a free software. After all, I had nothing against purchasing, but I had the feeling that there was something evil behind it. I did not pay any money to the authors of this software. I did not even pay to the authors of the program I purchased. The registration file I received was obviously a kind of a "install" for trial software, provided for some "good" reasons. The software should be registered with a given email address, which is an important feature for some people. However, I have not registered any email address in this program, so I am not sure why the authors wanted this. Also, I have to mention the license of this software. It is a Digital Rights Management license. I am aware of how this license works, and I am sure that I have no right to copy or distribute any of the data I purchased under this license. It is fair, so I am not going to pay for the data I have no right to. The next "issue" is that the installation process was created in a way, which requires registration, but the license makes me unable to register. In other words, I cannot provide my email address for registration, but the registration is mandatory. The software was installed on my PC. It was installed in C:\Program Files\dBpoweramp Reference\. As you see, it was installed in a non-default location, where I cannot open or run any software I might have purchased. In the end, all the stuff I did was to simply look for a registration file and install it in a non-default location. My question is: what can I do with this registration file? Can I simply open it? Can I execute it? Can I copy it to another PC? I will be glad to hear any hints about the right way of handling the registration, of the installation process, and of the license. I can perfectly understand why authors of free software are concerned about piracy of their software, and this is something I am not interested in. I do not want to do anything illegal, nor I want to make illegal things. The registration and the installation process was made to protect the software I have purchased from any pirate copies. I have to stress that I am not interested in any information or hints on how to
