The present invention relates to a storage system with a file-based high availability scheme, and more particularly to a storage system with a file-based high availability scheme capable of reducing the number of high availability switch applications by introducing an event level service activation protocol. In general, a storage system operates in a manner that a file system locates a specific file in a specific volume in response to a request from a host, reads the data from the specific volume, performs a certain logical operation on the read data, and stores the resulting data in a cache or in a specific volume. Generally, a storage system is provided with a high availability switch which can designate a switching destination of the read data to a different port or different storage volumes when an error or fault occurs in the storage system. In a high availability switch (HAS) disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 6,094,307, data to be transmitted is stored in a shared memory and then exchanged in a round-robin fashion to achieve a higher reliability. The conventional high availability switch is designed in view of a clustered configuration. Thus, when a write request for data having the same volume is input from a host in a shared memory, the data is passed through a specific access path before transmitting the data to the cluster. The conventional high availability switch has an access path which passes through the shared memory or a switch, but there are problems in that the volume is shared by every cluster and the switch is complicated in configuration, reducing the flexibility of the system. In a high availability switch described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,946,642, the volume is shared by every cluster. Thus, a volume access request may be excessively generated when a write request is input, reducing the performance 09e8f5149f
